HAVING already noticed the Publication alluded to by a writer who signs himself Charles Bentley, Liverpool, we do not feel it incumbent on us to admit any additional strictures on it; according to our judgment, a fair and candid report was then given of the Work in question, and we do not think any other necessary.

The Poetical Favours of A. K. are reserved for our next publication.

An Account of the Edifice, together with the subsequent occurrences which have taken place on the opening of Covent-Garden Theatre, will be given in our next Magazine, by which time, we hope, all heat and animosity will be allayed respecting the prices of admission.

Gentlemen disposed to favour the Publisher of this Magazine with Original Paintings of Sporting Subjects, are assured that the utmost care shall be taken of them, and of their being safely returned. FRONTISPIECE TO THE THIRTY-FOURTH VOLUME.

THE Frontispiece to our present Volume is—the huntress Arethusa, a nymph of Diana's train, flying from the ravisher Alpheus. The fabulous interpretation of this subject in the Pantheon, is as follows:

"Arethusa, a nymph of Elis, daughter of Oceanus, and one of Diana's attendants. As she returned one day from hunting, she sat near the Alpheus, and bathed in the stream. The god of the river was enamoured of her, and he pursued her over the mountains and all the country, when Arethusa, ready to sink under fatigue, implored Diana, who changed her into a fountain. The Alpheus immediately mingled his streams with her's, and Diana opened a secret passage under the earth and under the sea, where the waters of Arethusa disappeared, and rose in the island of Ortygia, near Syracuse, in Sicily. The river Alpheus followed her also under the sea, and rose also in Ortygia; so that, as mythologists relate, whatever is thrown into the Alpheus in Elis, rises again, after some time, in the fountain Arethusa, near Syracuse."

DISPUTES
BETWEEN GENTLEMEN,
On Points of Honour, &c. &c.

WE are going to offer some remarks upon a proceeding, not strictly in unison with the letter of our declaratory title; yet, as their spirit includes a reference to such disputes, we shall proceed to our brief comments.

It will be seen, in another part of this Magazine, that a trial hath occurred before the Sessions at Norwich, held on the 13th of July, in which a Mr. Whichcote Turner, (formerly Major Turner) exhibited articles for a breach of the peace against a very celebrated lady, Mrs. Lucy Sinclair Sutherland, who has long reigned as a brilliant planet in the world of gallantry, and whose name was frequently mentioned in the House of Commons, during the ever-memorable discussion upon the presumed official demerits of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, as Commander in Chief of the British forces.

In the statement with which Mrs. Sinclair Sutherland has favoured the public, it will be seen that she is a lady of more than ordinary beauty and attainments, and is, and has been, connected in friendship and correspondence with many of the highest characters in society, whether distinguishable for rank, power, or talents.

With regard to the points of difference between her and Mr. Turner, it doth clearly appear from her uncontradicted statement, not only that Mr. Turner has been under very serious obligations to Mrs. Sinclair Sutherland, but that she hath suffered great distress, both in body and mind, in consequence of this apparently unfortunate connexion. It hath appeared, by evidence, that Mr. Turner (who is represented as an athletic man) held his life as in a state of peril from the threats of Mrs. Sinclair Sutherland, who is a petite lady, of infinite grace of manner, and more likely to wound by the brilliancy of her eyes than the force of her arm. Yet Mr. Turner's representation of his personal sonal hazard, made so deep an impression upon the judgment of the Honourable Mr. Herbert, (either the Lord Lieutenant of the county, or his locum tenens, or a close relative) and upon some of the Magistrates, that they really, and bona fide, did believe that the affidavit of the exhibitor, Mr. Whichcote Turner, did contain sufficient matter, though not of the strongest sort, for them to order the delicate defendant, Mrs. Sinclair Sutherland, to enter into a recognisance to keep the peace towards Mr. Whichcote Turner, in the sum of £.100. for the space of twelve months!—It may be presumed that the apprehensions of the gentleman and his friends are now at rest for ever!

In former times, our Chevaliers
For Beauty took up arms,
And thought their valour highly paid,
When hail'd by Beauty's charms:

But, lack a day! our modern Knights
The arms of Beauty dread,
And supplicate the Law to shield
That weakest part—the head!

But, in some measure to prove that all the Magistrates on the Bench, were not precisely of opinion that this redoubtable little lady was of so terrific a nature, General Money, and several others, voluntarily offered to become her sureties, if such cautionary measures should be insisted upon.

As some anonymous hand-bills had been industriously circulated in New Buckenham and its neighbourhood, where Mrs. Sutherland at present resides, she has thought it necessary to publish a short history of herself, as a refutation of the unmanly calumnies which have been circulated to her disadvantage: and it is our opinion, that she ought to hold herself indebted to the administrations of Fortune, for having furnished her with an occasion in which she could, so ably and satisfactorily, triumph over the folly and imbecility of her enemies.

W.

DUEL BETWEEN LORD CASTLEREAGH AND MR. CANNING.

At five o'clock, on Thursday morning, Sept. 21, 1809, Lord Yarmouth waited on Lord Castlereagh, at his house in St. James's-square. In about half an hour they set out for Wimbledon, accompanied by Mr. Home, surgeon, of Sackville-street; they arrived at Wimbledon Common, about a quarter before seven, where Mr. Canning and Mr. Rose Ellis were already waiting for them. Having taken their ground precisely at seven o'clock, they fired by signal, and Mr. Canning, at the second fire, received the ball of his antagonist in the fleshy part of the thigh. As Mr. Canning was not attended by any surgeon, Mr. Home accompanied him in his chariot to Gloucester Lodge,* and dressed his wound. It was found on examination that the ball had passed quite through Mr. Canning's thigh on the outside of the bone, but fortunately none of the large blood vessels were injured, and the wound is not considered dangerous.

The occasion which gave rise to the above duel, has not been communicated, from any authority, to the public. No less than three different reports have appeared in the public newspapers, neither of which shall we at present notice, meaning to reserve what we may have further to say, both as to information and remark, until our next publication.

MR.

MR. WENTWORTH.

ON Wednesday night, August 30, 1809, died, at Towlstone Lodge, near Tadcaster, Yorkshire, truly and deservedly esteemed by all circles of society, Peregrine Wentworth, Esq.—He was in the 88th year of his age, being born July 31, 1722.

In May, 1751, Mr. Wentworth married Miss Thompson, only daughter of Beilby Thompson, Esq. of Escrick, near York, by his first wife, who was sole daughter and heiress of Sir Roger Beckwith, Bart. He afterwards married Mrs. Whitton, relict of William Whitton, Esq. of Lupset, near Wakefield, and sister to the late Dr. Assheton, of Middleton, near Manchester: he has left no issue by either marriage.

Mr. Wentworth was the last of the male line of the great Earl of Strafford. His remains were deposited in the family vault, in York Cathedral.—The funeral was respectably attended by his executors, Sir George Armytage, Bart. William Carr, Esq. of York; and Mr. Maude, of Wakefield; also by his nephew, Wentworth Searle, Esq. and other gentlemen, &c. &c.

Mr. Wentworth was highly and justly respected by every gentleman of the turf; upon which he commenced in 1754, though in 1752 he rode his hunter, a match, against Mr. Vernon's hunter, over York.

Mr. Wentworth held the office of Register for the West-Riding of Yorkshire, to which he was unanimously elected on Tuesday, May 14, 1765, in the room of Henry Hitch, Esq. of Leathley, near Otley, and to which Mr. Hitch was elected, November 3, 1749, in the room of Matthew Wentworth, Esq. (Mr. Wentworth's father). In this election, Mr. Hitch was opposed by William Stanhope, Esq. of Horsforth, and Lindley Simpson, Esq. of Stainford: the numbers were; for Mr. Hitch, 277; Mr. Stanhope, 251; and for Mr. Simpson, 79.

[Some lines to the memory of Mr. Wentworth, are given in the Poetical Department of our Magazine.—Mr. Wentworth's stud will be given next month.]

SINGLE-STICK PLAY AT WARMINSTER.

"THE single-stick play at Warminster on the 29th ult. was attended by a very numerous and respectable company from all parts of the country. The gamesters, both of Wilts and Somerset, displayed great skill and spirit during the day. The play between Ellis, of Wilts, and Browning, of Somerset, (in which the former gained the head), was perhaps as excellent as ever was seen. The contest for the prize lasted till night, when it terminated in favour of Somersetshire. On the following day, the weather being unfavourable, the company was not quite so numerous, nor was the play altogether so good as on the preceding day. James Line, whose play with W. Wall at Salisbury was so much admired, being in an ill state of health, did not engage on either day. Ellis, and some others of the best Wiltshire men, did not play on the second day; so that the prize was again obtained by the Somerset gamesters, who may on this occasion console themselves for the defeat which they lately sustained at Salisbury."

The above account, dated Warminster, Sept. 4, appeared in the Salisbury Journal of that day, and to which the following answer was sent afterwards:—

To

To the Editor of the Salisbury and Winchester Journal.

SIR—The account of the Single-Stick Play at Warminster on the 29th and 30th ult. that appeared in your last Journal, is so evidently written with a view to conceal the facts, that it would be an injustice to the champions of Somerset, if it were suffered to pass over in silence.

The play between Ellis and Browning was certainly, as therein stated, " excellent ;" but every person who witnessed it admits, that the contest between the former and William Wall (in which the latter gained the head) was a fine display of skill, and could only be excelled by the scientific manner in which Tucker, of Somerset, succeeded against Humphries. The state of the contest at four o'clock on the first day, (the period fixed for playing out the tyers) was, eight on the side of Somerset to five of Wilts ; and at the close of the day, six tyers of two heads each to one (Coleman) of Wilts: the odds being, therefore, too great for him to have any hopes of success, he gave in.

It is stated in the account alluded to, that " on the second day the play altogether was not so good as on Tuesday." I give the writer credit for the truth of the assertion, if he intends to confine his observation to the Wiltshire gamesters alone, because they lost twelve heads by four o'clock, without being enabled to obtain one! It is also stated, that " Ellis, and some of the best of the Wiltshire men, did not play the second day." The reason why they did not was, of course, because they were fearful of the consequences ; otherwise, why did they decline it, when repeatedly called for by their stickler and umpire ?—The same paragraph concludes with the curious and very modest period, " the prize was again obtained by the Somerset gamesters, who may, on this occasion, console themselves for the defeat which they lately sustained at Salisbury." Now, Sir, for the accuracy of this statement it is only necessary to refer you to the same Paper of the 7th of August last, but suffice it to say, " that they (the Somerset) carried off, on the first day, the prize easy, and the contest was very severe on the second day, when, however, the Wilts divided the prize." Where, then, is this exulting defeat to be found? The writer, in his hurry, no doubt meant to say, when speaking of defeat, that the Somerset lads so completely defeated the Wiltshire dons in the last contest, that it is expected they will be prudent enough not to meet them in this manly exercise again.

A CONSTANT READER.

Frome, Sept. 8, 1809.

YORKSHIRE GRAND CRICKET MATCH.

ON Monday, the 28th of August, a grand Cricket Match was played on Knavesmire, near York, for 100gs. a side, between the gentlemen of the Wetherby Club, and the gentlemen of all Yorkshire, which was decided the next day in favour of the latter.

At the first innings, the Wetherby Club scored 39, and the gentlemen of all Yorkshire 120—at the second innings the former scored 36 ; total 75. The gentlemen of all Yorkshire consequently won the Match, having scored 45 notches more in one innings, than the gentlemen tlemen of the Wetherby Club scored in two.—At the commencement, betting was rather in favour of the Wetherby Club; after the first innings, the odds were ten to one that the gentlemen of Yorkshire won.

Two marquees were erected on the ground, one for the accommodation of ladies and gentlemen, the other for the cricket-players; the former was at the expence of Mrs. Osbaldeston, where this lady handsomely entertained her visitors. Both tables were plentifully provided with handsome cold collations, consisting of the delicacies of the season, and the choicest wines. Many ladies and gentlemen of the first respectability were present.

In the evening of Monday, Mr. T. Duncombe gave an elegant dinner, at Etridge's inn, to a number of gentlemen, among whom were the following:—The Hon. E. Lascelles, M. P. Sir H. Ibbetson, Mr. Willoughby, Mr. Osbaldeston, Mr. Treacher, Mr. Cole, Mr. James Croft, Mr. Arthur Strickland, &c. &c.

AQUATIC SPORTS.

ONE day last month, an aquatic trial of skill afforded considerable gratification at Tenby; at twelve o'clock, thirteen Brixham fishing-smacks started by signal from the road, to sail round Caldy Island, and return through the Sound, for a Silver Cup, value 20l. given by Sir Charles Morgan, Bart. of Tredegar. The boats returned about four o'clock, when the Neatly was declared the winner; the second boat received five guineas, and the third three guineas. But the munificence of Sir Charles was not confined to the marine spectacle; soon after the boats started, an elegant company, consisting of 150 persons, sat down to a splendid breakfast, provided by the worthy Baronet, and laid out in the first style in booths on Castle Hill. The visitors comprised all the noble and fashionable personages in the place, who were entertained during breakfast with a variety of martial and other airs, by Captain Mansel's excellent band, and a number of favourite songs, catches, and glees, by several persons belonging to the Bath Theatre.

On Monday, August 28, a silver cup and cover, the gift of Mr. Cliffe, of the Waterman's Arms, Standgate, was rowed for by five four-oared pleasure-boats, the property of private gentlemen (amateurs). The boats that started were, the Venus, the Hero, the Mars, the Cleopatra, and the Fox. They started at a little after two o'clock from Westminster-bridge, up to Cumberland-gardens, near Vauxhall, and returning, rowed round the beacon opposite Hungerford, and then up to Westminster-bridge. The Fox won the first heat, the Cleopatra the second, and the Hero the third. These three consequently contested the fourth heat together; and at the termination, between eight and nine at night, the Fox was foremost by about two boats' lengths, and was consequently declared the victor, and her owners were presented with the silver cup. The evening was extremely favourable, and a vast number of boats were on the water.

THE DEAD SHOT,

A Tale.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

IN the year 1723, Colonel Ridley returned from India, with what in those days was counted an immense fortune, and retired to a country seat on the banks of North Tyne, in Northumberland. The house was rebuilt, and furnished with every thing elegant and costly; and amongst others, a service of plate supposed to be worth 1000l. He went to London annually with his family, during a few of the winter months, and at these times there were but few left at his country house. At the time we treat of there were only three domestics remained there; a maid servant, whose name was Alice, kept the house, and two men, who threshed the corn and took care of some cattle, for the two ploughmen were boarded in houses of their own.

One afternoon, as Alice was sitting spinning some yarn for a pair of stockings, to herself, a pedlar entered the hall with a comical pack on his back. Alice had seen as long a pack, and as broad a pack; but a pack equally as long, broad, and thick, she declared she never saw. It was about the middle of winter, when the days were short, and the nights cold, long, and wearisome. The pedlar was a handsome well-dressed man, and very likely to be an agreeable companion for such a maid as Alice, on such a night as that; yet Alice declared, that from the very beginning she did not like him greatly, and though he introduced himself with a little ribaldry, and a great deal of flattery interlarded, yet when he came to ask a night's lodging, he met with a peremptory refusal; he jested on the subject, said he believed she was in the right, for that it would be impossible for him to keep his own bed, and such a sweet creature lying alone under the same roof—took her on his knee, and ravished a kiss—but all would not do. "No, she would not consent to his staying there." "But are you really going to put me away to-night?" "Yes." "Indeed, my dear girl, you must not be so unreasonable; I am come straight from Newcastle, where I have been purchasing a fresh stock of goods, which are so heavy that I cannot travel far with them, and as the people around are all of the poorer sort, I will rather make you a present of the greatest shawl in my pack before I go further." At the mentioning of the shawl, the picture of deliberation was pourtrayed in lively colours in Alice's face for a little; but her prudence overcame. "No, she was but a servant, and had orders to harbour no person about the house but such as came on business, nor they either, unless well acquainted with them." "What the worse can either your master, or you, or any other person, be, of suffering me to tarry until the morning?" "I intreat you do not insist, for here you cannot be." "But, indeed, I am not able to carry my goods further to-night." "Then you must leave them, or get a horse to carry them away." "Of all the inflexible beings ever I saw, thou art the first! But I cannot blame you, your resolution is just and right. Well, well, since no better may be, I must leave them, and go search for lodgings myself somewhere else, for, fatigued as I am, it is as much as my life is worth to endeavour carrying them further." Alice was rather taken at at her word: she wanted nothing to do with his goods: the man was displeased at her, and might accuse her of stealing some of them; but it was an alternative she had proposed, and against which she could start no plausible objection, so she rather reluctantly consented. "But the pack will be better out of your way," said he, "and safer, if you will be so kind as lock it by in some room or closet." She then led him into a low parlour, where he placed it carefully on two chairs, and went his way, wishing Alice a good night.

When Alice and the pack were left in the large house by themselves, she could not, for her life, quit thinking of the pack one moment. What was in it which made it so heavy that its owner could not carry it? She would go and see what was in it. It was a very curious pack. At least she would go and handle it, and see what she thought was in it. She went into the parlour—opened a wall-press: she wanted nothing in the press: she never so much as looked into it: her eyes were fixed on the pack. "It was a very queer pack—it was square the one way, but not square the other way—it was a monstrous queer pack." It was now wearing late. She returned from the room in a sort of trepidation—sat down to her wheel, but could not spin one thread. "It is a droll pack yon! What made the man so very earnest with me to tarry all night? Never was man so importunate. What in the world has he got in it? Its a confounded queer pack after all: it's so long and so thick. It's a terrible queer pack."

What surmises will fear not give rise to in the mind of a woman! She lighted a moulded candle, and went again into the parlour, closed the window shutters, and barred them; but before she came out, she set herself upright, held in her breath, and took another steady and scrutinising look of the pack. God of mercy! She saw it moving as visibly as ever she saw any thing in her life. Every hair on her head stood upright. Every inch of flesh on her body crept like a nest of pigmires. She hasted into the kitchen as fast as she could, for her knees bent under the load of terror that had overwhelmed the heart of poor Alice. She puffed out the candle, lighted it again, and, not being able to find a candlestick, though a dozen stood on the shelf, in the fore kitchen, she set it in a water-jug, and ran out to the barn for old Richard. "Oh, Richard! Oh, for mercy, Richard, make haste, and come into the house. Come away, Richard." "Why, what is the matter, Alice? What is wrong?" "Oh, Richard! a pedlar came into the hall, intreating for lodging. Well, I would not let him stay on any account, and behold he is gone off and left his pack." "And what is the great matter in that," said Richard. "I will wager a penny he will look after it before it shall look after him." "But, Oh, Richard, I tremble to tell you! We are all gone, for it is a living pack." "A living pack," said Richard, staring at Alice, and letting his chops fall down. Richard had just lifted his flail over his head to begin threshing a sheaf; but when he heard of a living pack, he dropped one end of the hand-staff to the floor, and, leaning on the other, took such a look at Alice. He knew long before that Alice was beautiful; he knew that ten years before, but he never took such a look at her in his life.

life. "A living pack!" said Richard. "Why the woman is mad without all doubts." "Oh, Richard! come away. Heaven knows what is in it! but I saw it moving as plainly as I see you at present. Make haste and come away, Richard." Richard did not stand to expostulate any longer, nor even to put on his coat, but followed Alice into the house, assuring her by the way, that it was nothing but a whim, and of a piece with many of her phantages. "But," added he, "of all the foolish ideas that ever possessed my brain, this is the most unfeasible, and unnatural, and impossible. How can a pack, made of napkins, and muslins, and corduroy breeches, perhaps, ever become alive? It is even worse than to suppose a horse's hair will turn to an eel." So saying, he lifted the candle out of the jug, and, turning about, never stopped till he had his hand upon the pack. He felt the bales that surrounded its edges to prevent the goods being rumpled and spoiled, by carrying the cords that bound it, and the canvass in which it was wrapped. The pack was well enough. He found nought about it that other packs wanted. It was just like other packs made up of the same stuff. He saw nought that ailed it. And a good large pack it was. It would cost the honest man 200l. if not more. It would cost him more; but he would make it all up again by cheating fools, like Alice, with his gewgaws. Alice testified some little disappointment at seeing Richard unconvinced, even by ocular proof. She wished she had never seen either him or it howsomever, for she was convinced there was something mysterious about it; that they were stolen goods, or something that way; and she was terrified to stay in the house with it. But Richard assured her the pack was right enough.

During this conversation in comes Edward. He was a lad about sixteen years of age, son to a coal-driver on the border—was possessed of a good deal of humour and ingenuity, but somewhat roguish, forward, and commonly very ragged in his apparel. He was about this time wholly intent on shooting the crows and birds, of various kinds, that alighted in whole flocks where he foddered the cattle. He had bought a huge old military gun, which he denominated Copenhagen, and was continually thundering away at them. He seldom killed any, if ever, but he once or twice knocked off a few feathers, and, after much narrow inspection, discovered some drops of blood on the snow. He was at this very moment come in a great haste for Copenhagen, having seen a glorious chance of sparrows, and a Robin-red-breast, among them, feeding on the site of a corn rick, but hearing them talk of something mysterious, and a living pack, he pricked up his ears, and became all attention. "Faith, Alice," said he, "if you will let me, I'll shoot it." "Hold your peace, fool," said Richard. Edward took the candle from Richard, who still held it in his hand, and gliding down the passage, edged up the parlour door, and watched the pack attentively for about two minutes. He then came back with a spring, and with looks very different from those which regulated his features as he went down. As sure as he had death to meet with he saw it stirring. "Hold your peace, you fool," said Richard. Edward swore again that he saw it stirring; but whether he really thought so, or only said so, is hard to determine. "Faith, Alice," said he again, "if you will let me, I'll shoot it." "I tell you to hold your peace, you fool," said Richard. "No," said Edward, "in the multitude of counsellors there is safety; and I will maintain this to be our safest plan. Our master's house is confined to our care, and the wealth that it contains may tempt some people to use stratagems. Now, if we open up this man's pack, he may pursue us for damages to any amount, but if I shoot at it, what amends can he get of me? If there is any thing that should not be there, Lord how I will pepper it, and if it is lawful goods, he can only make me pay for the few that are damaged, which I will get at valuation; so, if none of you will acquiesce, I will take all the blame myself, and ware a shot on it." Richard said, whatever was the consequence he would be blameless. A half delirious smile rather distorted than beautified Alice's pretty face; but Edward took it for an assent to what he had been advancing, so snatching up Copenhagen in one hand, and the candle in the other, he hasted down the passage, and without hesitating a moment, fired at the pack. Gracious God! the blood gushed out upon the floor like a torrent, and a hideous roar, followed by the groans of death, issued from the pack. Edward dropped Copenhagen upon the ground, and ran into the kitchen like one distracted. The kitchen was darkish, for he had left the candle in the parlour; so taking to the door without being able to utter a word, he ran to the hills like a wild roe, looking over each shoulder as fast as he could turn his head from the one to the other. Alice followed as fast as she could, but lost half the way of Edward. She was all the way sighing and crying most pitifully. Old Richard stood for a short space rather in a state of petrifaction, but at length, after some hasty ejaculations, he went into the parlour. The whole floor flowed with blood. The pack had thrown itself on the ground; but the groans and cries were ceased, and only a kind of guttural noise was heard from it. Knowing that then something must be done, he ran after his companions and called on them to come back. Though Edward had escaped a good way, and was still persevering on, yet, as he never took long time to consider of the utility of any thing, but acted from immediate impulse, he turned and came as fast back as he had gone away. Alice also came homeward, but more slowly, and crying even more bitterly than before. Edward overtook her, and was holding on his course; but, as he passed, she turned away her face, and called him a murderer. At the sound of this epithet, Edward made a dead pause, and looked at Alice with a face much longer than it used to be. He drew in his breath twice, as if going to speak; but he only swallowed his spittle, and held his peace.

They were soon all three in the parlour, and, in no little terror and agitation of mind, loosed the pack, the principal commodity of which was a stout young man, whom Edward had shot through the heart, and thus bereaved of existence in a few minutes. To paint the feelings, or even the appearance of young Edward, during this scene, is impossible: he acted little, spoke less, and appeared in a hopeless stupor: the most of his employment consisted in swallowing his spittle, and staring at his two companions.

MR. LAWRENCE'S HISTORY AND DELINEATION OF THE HORSE.

THIS elegant work, some account of which has already appeared in our Magazine, (vol. xxxiii. p. 171) still proceeds, with a regularity and uniformity in the execution highly creditable to the proprietors.

Of twelve parts, of which the volume is to be composed, there are already eight before the public, each of which is enriched with a highly-finished engraving, by Mr. Scott, of a horse of some particular breed, accompanied by appropriate scenery, from a painting by Mr. Marshall.

This work is divided into sections, the first of which we select for the perusal of our readers:—

"The transcendent consequence of the Horse to man, in every possible stage of human existence, has been the invariable theme of writers on the subject, from the earliest records of literature. Indeed it is impossible to conceive any other, out of the vast variety of animals destined by nature to human use, which can with the least prospect of success, dispute with this favourite the palm of his master's predilection and attachment. Throughout all those revolving ages, which the magical power of letters enables us to call up in review, there is not one in which that axiom does not stand self evident: it is an attachment of a truly rational nature, and to a most worthy object. The very idea of being supported at ease, by an auxiliary and borrowed animal power, and of being safely borne from place to place, at will, with a pleasant and gentle motion, or with the rapidity of lightning, must have impressed the minds of the first discoverers of the mighty benefits with ineffable delight. Such sentiments and feelings have been incessantly echoed down to us from the primitive times.

"The general beauty, the harmony of proportions, the stateliness and delicacy, of the superior species of this paragon of brute animals, could not fail of inspiring admiration in the breasts even of savage and untutored men. Time, and the improving faculties of man, gradually developed the various uses and qualifications of the horse. Endowed by nature with a portion of intellect, with a generous pliability of disposition and fortitude of heart, with vast and energetic bodily powers, he was found capable of bearing a sort of social part in all the pleasures and labours of man. He was associated with his master in the pleasures of the journey and the chase; he shared willingly, and with ardour, in the dangers of the martial field; and, with a sturdy prowess, partook in the humble labours of cultivating the soil for mutual subsistence. By the most illustrious nations of either ancient or modern times, the horse has ever been esteemed of the highest worth and consequence, and treated with a distinction and attendance befitting his rank as the first of domestic animals, approximating in society and service to human nature. It is among the most savage and debased tribes of men only, that the breed, condition, and comforts of this noble animal, have been neglected.

"To ascertain the period, or even to form a probable guess on the first domestication of the horse, and and determine to what nation of antiquity the honour of his subjugation appertains, although sometimes attempted by the curious and inquisitive, has never returned any other fruit, than the labour or amusement of the enquiry. Notwithstanding we are convinced of the fact of his early subjugation, the date of it lies concealed beyond the impassible horison of a too remote antiquity. In fine, it is one of those truths which stand not in need of proof. It is sufficient that the earliest writers, whose works have reached our times, describe the horse as having been immemorially in the subjection and servitude of man.

"Natural historians have agreed to designate the horse by the following generic character.

"Front teeth in the upper jaw, six parallel.

"In the lower jaw, six somewhat projecting.

"Canine teeth, one on each side, in both jaws, remote from the rest.

"Feet with undivided hoofs.

"The horse genus seems to be susceptible of far less variety of form than our other domesticated animals, although applicable to a greater variety of uses. A native of every country in the old world, it forms matter of curious speculation, that he should be found in no part of the new, or America, abounding as that immense country does, both upon the continent and the islands, with soils and provision so well adapted to his support; and so amply as that fact has been proved by his multitudinous increase in those countries, since his first introduction by the Spaniards and other Europeans. Is it then that there was one, or a limited number of spots upon the earth, on which the horse originated, and whence he emigrated, or was selected to replenish other regions? There is a very obvious reason, which ought to set all such speculations at rest: there can exist no physical possibility of reducing them to facts. The non-existence of the horse in America, previous to its discovery by Europeans, has, however, been disputed, but I recollect not by whom, or upon what ground.

"In a division of the equine genus into its original and artificial varieties, and their appropriations, I shall propose the following concise theory, sufficient, I apprehend, for every useful or practical purpose. The horse, then, may be rationally supposed to have consisted originally of two grand divisions or species; the silken-haired, flat, and fine-boned courser, and the full-bodied, coarse, and rough-haired steed, adapted to draft and the more laborious purposes. It is also, indeed, probable, that size may have been an original distinction, in these and all other animals, since we often see so much perfection and originality of form, in the smaller sizes, as to render it almost impossible to attribute such accident to degeneration.

"From the above original species may fairly be derived all those numerous varieties which we at this day witness in different parts of the world. Soil and climate must indubitably have considerable effects, through a long course of ages, in producing varieties of form, colour, character, and properties. The largest animals are generally found to be the production of the rich lowlands of temperate climates, abounding in rich and succulent food. The fine-skinned, with elegant symmetry, dry and solid bones, large tendons, and the highest degree of muscular energy, in fact bearing the general characteristic of wild animals, are bred under warm and southern skies, upon a dry soil, on the hills in the desart. As we advance towards the ungenial northern climes, we find the domestic animals void of external symmetry, coarse in hide and flesh, and their bones, although of greater bulk, porous, and comparatively deficient in substance and weight. We here approach the native regions of the cart-horse, and we have just stated the natural characteristic distinctions between him and the courser. There are doubtless anomalies or variations in this, as well as in most other cases: the high northern latitudes produce small and active animals, whilst the dromedary and the elephant are bred in the arid and barren desarts of the south; soils, it might be supposed, the least adapted to the production and support of animals of such a vast bulk.

" Either because such is the fact, or for the sake of obtaining a convenient hypothesis, we make Arabia the native or breeding country of the courser, and that part of Europe formerly denominated the Netherlands, or Low Countries, the aboriginal soil of the large draught horse. Without stopping to enquire, whether the two species originally sprang up, or grew in these particular countries, a thing which we can never ascertain, we will pass on to facts which we really know, namely, that those two regions are not only peculiarly adapted, by nature, soil, and climate, each to the production of its respective indigenous species of the horse, but that the largest, and the most beautiful and highly qualified, have been, from the earliest periods of which any accounts are extant, procured from thence. From Arabia has issued the prototype of the best shaped, speediest, and most lasting racer, and from Belgium, the draught horse of the greatest bulk and weight in the world.

" To advert cursorily to the common hypothesis which we have rejected, that all horses are derived from the same single primitive species, and that varieties are purely accidental, and the effects of varying soil and climate: we must remark, that such opinion, whether simply true or false, has given rise to the most absurd conjectures.—For these, the otherwise justly celebrated Buffon has distinguished himself beyond all other writers, and it is difficult to read with a grave face, his system of species and variety in the canine genus, with his derivations, and his metamorphoses of one species into another, merely from the change of air and food! This acute naturalist, as well as our British farmers, had overlooked the possibility, or rather almost inevitability, of intercopulations. In truth, allowing full force to the arguments derived from the effect of soil and climate, it is equally true there are certain landmarks and boundaries of specific character in both the animal and vegetable creation, which nature will never permit to be passed. No length of time, or naturalization, upon the marshy soil of Belgium, it may safely be pronounced, would be sufficient to transform the high-bred, silken, and bounding courser of Arabia, into the coarse, bluff, and fixed horse of the former country; nor would the sojournment of the latter, during any number of ages, in the south, have the effect of endowing him with these peculiar properties of body body which distinguish the aboriginal southern horse. Of that which would probably happen in this case, we are enabled to judge from the experience of centuries. The least-practised eye can distinguish in our race horses, a separate breed from the common one of the country, to wit, that of the southern horse, with the facility that a man, although no draper, can discriminate between linsey-woolsey and silk. The interchange above supposed would doubtless have the effect of increasing the bulk of the courser, and reducing that of the draught horse; but the natural and unchangeable characteristics of each would remain unassailable by any other medium than that of intercopulation, through which we know by experience also they may be merged, and in effect annihilated.

"Of the spurious progeny of the horse, the mule is well known in all countries, the jumard in many upon the European continent. The former is more usually produced from the mare and the ass, which is found to be far superior in size and spirit to the mule proceeding from the opposite cross. Of the jumard, or mule resulting from the conjunction of the horse with the cow, we know nothing practically, in this country; but can argue little from such a plan, but the spoiling of beef, and a diminution of the powers of labour: we are indeed uninformed as to the motives for such a cross.

"The motives for breeding the common mule are, to obtain a labouring animal of less expence than the horse. This animal, according to nature's general rule of like producing like, inferior to one parent and superior to the other, makes a hardy and patient drudge, either for the saddle or draught, well calculated for barren, hilly, and stony countries, partaking of the nature of the ass in hardiness, and being content with inferior provender, in sure-footedness and longevity; and of the nature of the horse in size, strength, and speed. The defects of the mule, his restiveness and asinine qualities, are well known. The production of mule animals, which possess not the power of procreation, appears to be nature's bar to an extreme confusion of species: but, as if no general rule could exist without an exception, well attested instances have been published of mules which have bred: the circumstance has occurred formerly in Hayti, in the West Indies, and also lately in North Britain, a particular account of which may be found in the Farmer's Magazine.

"A curious circumstance leads us a little out of our way to speak of the ass. It seems to be the only domesticated animal which our salubrious climate and fertile soil have not improved. In fact, the ass has degenerated with us. He bears the indubitable mark of a southern origin, and we believe was unknown in this country until the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Being comparatively of small use here, he has been generally confined to the very lowest of the people, and, in course, has had little chance of improvement; it is, however, not very clear to judge from those few among us which have been well kept, that the ass will acquire any great size in Britain, either because the original breed imported was small, or that our climate is unsuitable. The Grecian, Maltese, Spanish, and in general the southern asses, are animals of large size, some of them exceeding the height of fifteen hands, and in all respects superior to those produced in this country: nevertheless, the English mule is preferred to the Spanish, in the West India markets, and brings a much greater price; doubtless on account of being bred from English mares, the stallion ass, too, being frequently foreign."

OXFORDSHIRE PUGILISM.

ON Thursday, the 14th instant, a very hard-fought battle took place on Culham Heath, in the county of Oxford, between Davis, a labourer, of Culham, and Herman, a farmer, of Hanney, Berks, which was attended by many of the most noted pugilists from London, and a vast concourse of people from various parts of the country. The contest lasted an hour and forty-two minutes, and consisted of fifty-seven rounds. The combatants had once before met, and tried their skill and strength in the same honourable way, but victory in both instances declared in favour of Davis, who shewed the most scientific skill in the art of pugilism.

Round 1. Much sparring and shy fighting. Both fell.

56. The same; both fell.

57. Davis knocked down.

Herman then resigned the contest.

James Belcher was second to Davis, and Williams to Herman.

MRS. SINCLAIR SUTHERLAND.

At the Norfolk County Sessions, on Thursday, the 13th of July, before a bench of near fifty Magistrates, a cause came on which had for some time greatly excited public curiosity. It will be recollected, that one of the charges which were brought against the Duke of York, was his refusing Major Whichcote Turner leave to sell his commission; he, the Commander in Chief, being guided by will of Lucy Anne Sinclair, or Sutherland, who was supposed to have some considerable influence with his Royal Highness.

Major (now Mr.) Turner, resides at Buckenham, near Attleborough, in Norfolk; and for some time Mrs. Sutherland had lived with him. Altercations had arisen between the parties, and Mr. Turner exhibited articles against this lady for a breach of the peace, stating, in his affidavit, that he was in bodily fear of his life, for Mrs. Sutherland had once declared, in Kent, she would be revenged on him; that since that time, on the 8th of March, she came to his house, in Norfolk, and took possession of it for some days; but when Mrs. Sutherland came, he went away into Suffolk. On Sunday, the 4th of June, Mrs. Sutherland came in the morning before he was up, and again took possession of his house. He, the exhibitor, went away to his brother-in-law's, the Rev. Mr. Methold, of Stonham; and, on their return on the following Thursday, the affidavit stated, Mrs. Sutherland locked the door against him, but it was afterwards opened; and that when Mr. Turner and Mr. Methold went in, Mrs. Sutherland holding, in a menacing manner, a large iron fork in her hand, exclaimed—"If that rascal touch me, I will run this through his thick head!"—The affidavit went on to state, that Mr. Turner applied to the Hon. George Herbert, to exhibit articles of the peace against her, when she again behaved violently; and he, Mr. Whichcote Turner, being in bodily bodily fear, begged that Court to restrain the said Lucy Anne Sinclair Sutherland from maiming him, by finding sureties for her keeping the peace.

Several Counsel were heard on both sides; after which, Mrs. Sutherland herself addressed the Bench, and stated that no part of her conduct could warrant the proceedings of Mr. Turner. That as to forcibly taking possession of his house, the house had been made what it is by her property, on which, indeed, Mr. Turner had been maintained for a long time past. That her acquaintance with Mr. Turner originated in the most honourable offers, and though obstacles arose to the fulfilment of his promises, he afterwards professed the same attachment; but altercations had arisen in consequence of his ill treatment, and she went to his house to claim her property. That she had taken up a little fork, with which she had been toasting bread for her breakfast, to defend herself, fearing he might be inclined to use violence, and said to him, "If you do attempt to use violence to me, I shall be under the necessity of defending myself, and I will stick this fork into your foolish head, not into your brains, for you have none." She added, "Gentlemen, can it be believed, that so small and weak a person as myself could use sufficient violence towards a man of Mr. Turner's athletic person as to put him in fear of his life? You will scarcely think I could reach his head, (Mr. Turner was close by her) much less the place where his brains ought to lie." She had intended, she said, to have suffered being committed to Norwich Castle rather than give her recognisance to appear at the Sessions, and for this purpose Mr. H. the Magistrate, on her refusing to use her own carriage in the rain, ordered the constables to get a cart to convey her, but none of the farmers would lend one for the purpose, when he said a sledge would be good enough. Her Counsel, Mr. Cowper, however, advised her to give her recognisance.

Mr. Plumptre addressed the Bench of Magistrates; observing, that it was the opinion of the Chairman, and in which, on mature reflection, he coincided, that the affidavit of the exhibitor (Mr. Whichcote Turner) did contain sufficient, though none of the strongest grounds, for them to order the defendant to enter into a recognisance to keep the peace. General Money said, if sureties were demanded, they ought not to be for more than 10l. and he was ready to be one of them, as were likewise other gentlemen.

The Chairman ordered the Clerk of the Court to inform Mrs. Sutherland, that it was the decision of the Court, that she should enter into a recognisance in the sum of 100l. to keep the peace towards the exhibitor, Mr. Whichcote Turner, for the space of twelve months.

Mrs. Sutherland is an elegant figure, of the middle stature, a brunette, with fine dark eyes, and en-bon-point. She is a very accomplished woman, speaking fluently several languages. She was dressed entirely in white, with a small straw hat, tied with a little piece of blue ribbon, and wore a black veil.

Since the above trial, and during the present month, Mrs. Sinclair Sutherland has published the following address:—

TO THE INHABITANTS OF NORFOLK.

Unwilling as a female must feel to obtrude her name on the public, I am nevertheless again compelled to such an appeal. Since my appearance at the Norwich Sessions, paragraphs, containing the most atrocious falsehoods against myself and family, have been printed in some of the London newspapers; and, within the last few weeks, an anonymous hand-bill, repeating the same aspersions, has been circulated at New Buckenham (where I at present reside), and in the vicinity. These hand-bills, I have been assured by my kind neighbours, they have received at the house of Mr. Whichcote Turner, at Old Buckenham, the author of all my injuries. To vindicate myself from these imputations among those persons who may take an interest in my fate, but to whom I am unknown, and in justice to my parents, my daughter, and my friends, I now submit to the public the outline of a life, which, though not without error, has passed, I trust, without a crime.

My father was not a Jew, nor did he reside at Frankfort, as has been represented. He was educated with a Prince of the House of Denmark, was of a high and distinguished family, lived for thirty years in New North-street, Red Lion-square, as a rich and respectable merchant, and I am pained beyond measure, that his honoured name should be called in question. Mr. Charles Harvey, the Recorder at Norwich, and Mr. Twining, both well known in this county, were acquainted with my dear father, and are still acquainted with my brother and his family, now on the Continent; and though I am a stranger to those gentlemen, I doubt not they will readily attest the truth of what I have stated. Indeed, Sir Thomas Beevor told me recently, that Mr. Twining had dined at his house, and acknowledged me to be the person I represented myself.

In the year 1791, I was placed by my father, during his absence, in a boarding-school at Paris, to complete the different branches of my education. At the house of a Col. Blackden, where I was occasionally allowed to visit, I had the misfortune to meet with Col. Sinclair, an officer in the royal army, who, hearing the large property my father possessed in the French funds, took advantage of my inexperience to persuade me to marry him without consulting my relatives. My father so highly disapproved of Colonel Sinclair's general character, and was so greatly exasperated at my undutiful behaviour, that it is with sorrow I own he never was afterwards quite reconciled to me, though he left me at his death, ten years ago, an equal share of his property. From the period of my marriage in the year 1791, which was my first entrance into life, I resided at Coblentz with Col. Sinclair, or, during his absence with the army, at Bruxelles; and it was not till after the first unfortunate campaign, which caused his regiment to be disbanded, and which consequently deprived him of his bread, that he ever expressed the least wish to separate from me. At that period, Col. Sinclair became intimately acquainted at Bruxelles, with a lady of fortune and powerful connexions in Scotland, with whom he thought, under the embarrassed state of his affairs, an alliance would be adviseable, my father refusing him all pecuniary assistance (excepting a few presents to myself), and as every person of education, who has visited the Continent, must know that a divorce is obtained there with

with the utmost ease, and at little expence, without the necessity of criminality being attached to either party, Col. Sinclair therefore availed himself of the power of a husband, in a catholic country, to compel me, under a threat of shutting me up for life in a convent, to agree to a divorce, which remains registered in the court, called the Greffe, at Bruxelles. By this register it will appear, that I am not accused of any inpropriety, and that the sole alledged cause of our disunion was family dispute. Soon after my divorce, I returned to England, in the year 1794, and have never since left this country. I was advised to resist the oppression practised against me at Bruxelles, and to enter a suit against Col. Sinclair, in Doctors' Commons, for adultery, and for a maintenance; for the lady above alluded to had taken my name, and was living openly with him, in great splendour, in Grafton-street, Fitzroy-square, while I, from the dissatisfaction of my family towards me, was reduced to teach music to support myself and child.—Could Col. Sinclair have proved that I had misconducted myself, or that our divorce had arisen from crime, he would have recriminated; for, by so doing, my complaint would have been dismissed the Court, and he would have been freed from my law expences, which he repeatedly has been compelled to pay, and for the non-payment of the last demand, was, seven years ago, excommunicated in Queen-square Church. Between two and three years ago, I accidentally discovered that I needed not the interference of the law to disunite me from Col. Sinclair, because he had a wife alive at Anapolis Royal, Nova Scotia, at the very time he was married to me. Mr. Turner has seen the written documents in my possession, and knows the respectability of the parties, who are ready at any time to attest the same fact. He had further engaged, that, in whatever way my disunion probably could be legally effected, he would defray all expences; and every thing to this intent was so far arranged, that it was only suspended till Mr. T. had quitted the army.

About four years ago I took the name of Sutherland, in consequence of property left to me, upon that condition, by a female relative.

During my residence upon the Continent, I was known to families of the highest distinction; among other persons, to Louis the XVIIIth, and Monsieur, his brother, whose Court was kept at Coblentz; and at Bruxelles to Lord Elgin,* our English Minister, and Count

* I transcribe the following note from the original, among many others now in my possession, in proof of this assertion.

Bruxelles, 1793.—Lord Elgin presents his compliments to Mrs. Sinclair, and regrets much not to have had it in his power to answer her note last night.—If Mrs. Sinclair wishes to convey any thing to Mademoiselle Metternich, after Mrs. S. leaves Brussels, Lord Elgin will be very happy to deliver it, and obey any direction Mrs. S. may be so good as to favour him with. As for bringing things from England, he is sorry to have no particular conveyance whatever.—He takes the liberty of mentioning, that Mademoiselle Metternich did, in conversation last night, say that Mrs. Sinclair had been so obliging as to offer to procure Count Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, who can be appealed to for the truth of my assertions, and for the propriety of my conduct. Since I have been in England, my residence has been in London, (for these last four years in Portman-street) where I am received in a circle of respectable friends, some of whom are nearly related to families in this county.

When Mr. Turner first induced me to listen to his proposals of marriage, I had an income of 1900l. per annum, and my establishment was suitable to my condition; and the gentleman to whom I referred Mr. Turner, and who was kind enough to act in my behalf, was a Field-Officer of great consideration in his Majesty's service, and to whose sister I had formerly been much endeared.

From Mr. Turner's acquaintance I have not only suffered great pecuniary loss, but have been reduced to the lowest condition of wretchedness, and have undergone mental distress more acute than language can convey, from the embarrassments he subjected me to; and I shall shortly print a narrative of all the circumstances of our connexion, supported by authenticated copies of his letters, and other documents in my possession; all of which will clearly shew, that no part of my conduct affords him the slightest pretence for his behaviour. Those who may be interested for either of us, will then have the surest means of judging between us. My present statement is now before the public, and every one will have the power of determining, how far it is just and honourable to make me the subject of anonymous hand-bills and fictitious histories.

LUCY SINCLAIR SUTHERLAND.

CANINE AFFECTION.

With an Engraving.

THE following instance of canine affection, we believe is not to be paralleled in quadruped history.

On the 18th of April last, Mr. Gough, of Manchester, was at Patterdale, on his road to Wyburn, a place he frequently visited in summer, for the agreeable amusement of fishing. After receiving some refreshment at the inn, Mr. Gough requested the assistance of a guide to conduct him over the mountains, but it being a general review of the volunteers in that neighbourhood, he could not procure one; he therefore proceeded on his journey, without any other companion than a favourite spaniel bitch, and had never been heard of until Saturday, the 20th of June following, when a shepherd boy, in search of a sheep that had strayed, wandering that way, was attracted to the fatal spot by the howling of the bitch, which had pupped at a little distance, and was still watching over the remains of her master.

The boy immediately hastened to Patterdale, and informed some procure her some fans from England, but that she had declined giving Mrs. S. that trouble, having already commissioned them some time ago. Lord Elgin begs a thousand pardons for his freedom in repeating this conversation, but he conceives, from knowing well what commissions are, that in case Mrs. S. had in view the sending any fans, this hint may not be unacceptable to her.

of the inhabitants of the circumstance, who returned with him to the place at the foot of the crag, where they found the skeleton in the clothes, except the skull, which was about seven or eight yards from the trunk, lying at the bottom of a precipice of about two hundred yards. His fishing rod was found at the top, and about half way down a small bundle had lodged on a bramble bush: his sporting basket lay near a stream that rushed from a chasm in the rocks. From the frequency of carcases of animals being devoured by birds of prey, which assembled there in great numbers, there can be little doubt but that the flesh of the body, which was partly consumed, had fallen a sacrifice to these voracious birds.

About an hour after Mr. Gough set out from Patterdale, a great quantity of hail fell, accompanied with a heavy fog, which continued over the mountains for the whole day, so that it is most probable he had missed his way when he met with the fatal accident. His remains were collected, and decently interred in the Friends' burying-ground at Tirril.

The deceased was born in the society of Quakers, of which he remained a member till about two years before the accident, when, in conformity with the professed principles of the society, he was excluded for joining a volunteer corps.

The affection of the spaniel, and her patiently remaining for so long a period by the body of her beloved master, occasioned some doubt as to the veracity of the circumstance; but upon a minute investigation, the whole appeared strictly true. Her pupping during the time, and nurturing her offspring, have been set beyond a doubt: from the quantity of small bones and feathers found near the place, it was conjectured, that this faithful bitch must have subsisted on the birds that descended to devour the flesh of her master: an opinion by no means improbable, as the creature, when discovered, was in no respect famished, and her puppies were in excellent condition; as those gentlemen can testify who still retain and caress the offspring, for the attachment and fidelity of the mother.

The annexed engraving was taken from a drawing made on the spot, by a correspondent, to whom our publication has been frequently indebted for entertaining communications, and who, as well as the artist, exhibits all the spirit of the true sportsman.

ORIENTAL FIELD SPORTS.

SOME years ago, Captain Williamson returned from the East Indies, where he had, for a considerable period, been an eye-witness of the field sports of that quarter of the world. An artist, under the direction of the Captain, made a number of large and spirited drawings of these sports, which were afterwards engraved in a bold, free manner: from these large prints a lesser set has been subsequently executed, and incorporated in an elegant descriptive work in two volumes, which though, from the make of the paper, is only octavo, yet the volumes are nearly of the quarto size.

The title is, "Oriental Field Sports; being a complete, detailed, and accurate description of the wild sports of the East; and exhibiting, in a novel and interesting manner, manner, the natural history of the elephant, the rhinoceros, the tiger, the leopard, the bear, the deer, the buffalo, the wolf, the wild hog, the jackall, the wild dog, the civet, and other domesticated animals: as likewise the different species of feathered game, fishes, and serpents; the whole interspersed with a variety of original, authentic, and curious anecdotes, taken from the manuscript and designs of Captain Thomas Williamson, who served upwards of twenty years in Bengal. The drawings by Samuel Howett, made uniform in size, and engraved by the first artists."

The plates are forty in number, each illustrated, as the title expresses, with complete details of the wild sports of the East.

The undermentioned is selected for the amusement of our readers:

SHOOTING AT THE EDGE OF A JUNGLE.

Probably few dogs are to be found better qualified for the gun than the pointers of India. The prodigious quantities of game, especially of hares, partridges, quails, and, in some places, of florikens, ender it necessary for the Indian sportsman to be choice in his breed of dogs, whose staunchness is an important object where the jungles are so numerous, and into which, if game should escape, it is not easy to follow. This may cause a pointer to be somewhat sluggish, not having such fine open ranges as in the turnip fields and stubbles in this part of the world; but for the edges of heavy covers, where the game is generally found, it is an indispensable qualification. For the open field the cross-bred dog, produced from the admission of a good spaniel once in six or seven generations, though extremely difficult to break in, is certainly the most lively, and most capable of enduring fatigue. For India, a dog can scarcely be of too light a frame, and should have all the dew-claws, that is to say, all but the four on each foot, cut off, when about fifteen or twenty days old; else the hard clods, and numerous stumps, occasion great pain and trouble.

It is necessary to have a dooreah, or dog-keeper, for every brace of greyhounds taken out to course; for few, or none, are so well broke as to remain with a horseman without playing truant so much as to fatigue himself, and render his exertions, when required, of no avail. Each dog wears a leather collar, on which is fastened a ring, large enough to admit a rope of about an inch in circumference. One end of the rope is looped and passed over the dooreah's wrist; the other end is passed through the ring and returns to the hand, whence it is liberated when game is put up.—The greyhounds are commonly kept near the horsemen, who lay them to the proper course.

The hares in India are, in many places, large and bony, affording excellent diversion. Those to the northward, about Oude, Ferruckabad, and in Rohilcund, run surprisingly well: none but very fleet dogs can equal them. Such hares as are found in Bengal and Bahar, being for the greater part bred in heavy grass jungles, and of a smaller kind, are by no means so swift. They get their food, which is extremely nourishing, with great ease, and taking but little exercise, cannot compare for foot with those produced on the extensive wastes, and which subsist on less delicate provision. The same greyhounds that may catch four or five hares within the provinces, will often find the the utmost exertion requisite to bring home one from the plains of Barelly or Joosy.

There being very few hedges, and the ditches being very insignificant throughout the upper country, coursing is easy to the horseman; who may generally at a moderate canter keep near enough to enjoy the chase, and to come in at the death. This is especially the case with foxes, which, often trusting too much to their tricks, neglect urging their way to cover, but seek for ridges, and little tufts of grass or briars, among which they wind with incredible agility; protracting the fatal moment a thousand times by a multitude of involutions and vaultings, while the spectator is in continual expectation of seeing each device the last. The natives have an opinion that a fox can double nine times within the square of his own length, without checking his speed; but this is merely proverbial, and exactly tallies with the usual strain of hyperbole current among all ranks. That a fox will turn and twist through a pack of hounds, each of which makes a snap with the apparent certainty of seizure, is well known to all sportsmen: but according to the old adage, "the pitcher will be broken at last." If greyhounds be not somewhat too forward, they never can pick up a hare, much less a fox, whose wiles and suppleness supply such abundant means of evitation. The reader must here understand that the Indian fox is very small; being, indeed, not much heavier than a very large jack-hare. He is long and low, of a beautiful form, his fur of a handsome reddish brown, each hair having a fine white tip; and, in contradistinction to the European fox, his muzzle and the tip of his tail are white. The fur is nearly as thick and soft as that of a rabbit; if they could be procured in any quantity, they would be a valuable acquisition to the furrier.

Foxes may be seen frequently about day-break, or at sun-rise, sitting in pairs, or with their young, at the entrances of their earths, which are, for the most part, on spots rather elevated, so as to preclude the danger of being deluged. The sight of any alarming object causes the whole to vanish in a second. They are extremely snappish when young, but are not very difficult to domiciliate.

Those who shoot in India will find from No. 6 to 9 patent, the best sizes for shot. The covers being thick, the game is usually sprung within a short distance; so that even the smallest shot may, from being little dispersed, kill heavy birds. One of the best shots I ever saw, never used any other than No. 9; and I would venture to say his game bag, in the same number of discharges, might vie with that of any sportsman! In shooting, much depends on a good eye, quickness of covering, and a smart lock. A person possessing these requisites with proper coolness, might be backed on all occasions, against any more precise but more dilatory sportsman. It often happens that a bird rises from the midst, or at the very border, of a heavy cover, and no time is to be lost. When the game lies among rhur, the diversion bears a strong resemblance to woodcock shooting; as that kind of cover is sometimes thin and scattered. If it have a good mat of grass, &c. at the bottom, abundance of quails may generally be found.

There are various kinds of partridges; the most common is the red red bird, very similar to what is seen in England; but they are so given to running, especially among interspersed covers and ravines, as to make the pursuit of them very fatiguing, and very precarious. They spoil young dogs, which losing their tempers, reject controul, and frequently become totally unfit for the field. Nothing but a rapid pursuit gives the sportsman a chance of success, and even then a long shot must be expected. If the bird be only winged, he is nearly as secure as ever; for his legs will carry him fast enough to effect his escape. This kind of partridge is commonly very dry eating, except in the corn season, when the chicks are excellent.

There are two distinct kinds of partridge, both known by the name of chuckore. That which is the true fire-eater, for it will swallow red-hot cinders, &c. is a native of Napaul, and is rarely seen wild in the Company's territories. It has a short neck, a leather-bound eye, is very plump and round in its form, and has a remarkable figure of a crescent on its breast. This crescent is of a deep brown or chocolate colour: the rest of its plumage differs little from that of the common grey bird. The other kind of chuckore is to be found along the banks of all the great rivers, and indeed in all low situations where the cover is high, along the whole extent south of Monghyr. I cannot describe it better than by saying that it is, in my opinion, the common grouse of Europe. It subsists chiefly on beetles, and a large flat seed produced by a species of weed, whose capsules resemble those of the carrot. The Napaul chuckore will rarely thrive unless ants are in abundance.

The black partridge is most in request, both as affording the best sport, and being best for the table. These are to be found generally in short close grass, particularly on large plains supplied with water, and near cultivation. Sometimes they abound in very heavy grass jungles, such as the surput. They are rather larger than the common red bird, and far heavier in proportion to their difference of bulk. The hen is not unlike a cock grouse, but has a reddish band of about an inch or more in breadth round the neck, and the plumage is somewhat darker, being of a deep chocolate colour. The cock is a fine bird! His eyes are leather-bound, his beak is of a bright nut colour, and his neck and breast are of a jet black, the latter, in particular, having on every feather a milk-white spot about the size of a tare. The rest of the body has strong game plumage, rather darker than that of the hen bird. In some places I have observed anomalies from this description; among which I have to notice that of a deficiency of the white spots on the breast.

During the winter months quails are very numerous. They are birds of passage, begin to shew themselves as soon as the rains subside, and remain in general till about the middle of March. They are partial to short tufted grasses interspersed with low bushes; taking to the stubbles of rice grounds for food. This affords a curious change; it being extremely common to find them in mud and puddles, sitting on small clods, or patches of straw, while on the other hand snipes may be put up in abundance from the dry covers. This, however, is confined to the large brown quail; for of the smaller kinds, such as the blue-beaks and others, many may be found in bevies as well as single throughout the year among underwoods and heavy grasses. The blue-blue-beaks, which are not larger than wrens, teaze dogs very much by their running and short flights. The red-breasts are rarely to be seen alone, they are nearly as large as the annual or brown quails. It is very curious that the flesh of their breasts is mostly half white and half brown; but they seldom are so fat as the annual quail, which being fed in cages, become quite a lump of marrow. In the month of March they can scarcely fly, being then in the highest state of perfection, and too rich to be eaten in any quantity. A kind of quails with dappled wings and speckled breasts is found to the northward: as is also a species, which, like the fire-eater before described, is marked on the breast with a crescent: both these sorts are small, but of an excellent flavour.

Woodcocks are so extremely scarce, that most of the best and oldest sportsmen doubt whether one is to be found in India. However, two or three have to my knowledge been shot. Indeed, I am greatly mistaken if I did not one day see several brace, as I was following the course of a small spring through an extensive jungle of underwood near Hazary Baug. They flitted before me for at least a mile, suddenly dropping as they got out of my reach, and taking great care to dog in such a manner through the bushes as to destroy every possibility of taking an effectual aim. It was in the month of January, when we had as sharp a frost as ever I can remember to have experienced in India. There was also a number of snipe, of which I got a few brace.

Snipes come in with the cold weather, but will not lie except during the mid-day. They abound in all low swampy covers, and are very high flavoured. The painted snipe, so called from its being, about the wings in particular, richly ornamented with beautiful, though dark colours, is about as large as a thrush, and flies as heavy as a crow. In reeds and bull-rushes standing at the edges of pools, they are often numerous. Their flesh is by no means delicate. They live chiefly on water weeds, which are found in them when killed.

The floriken is a species of the bustard, but never, I believe, grows to the size of what have been considered as a fair average in England. I think the largest I ever saw would not weigh so much as a moderate sized goose. This bird is peculiarly characterised by a pink-coloured down to every feather, and by its having only three toes to each foot. The cock is a noble bird, but its flight is very heavy and awkward; consequently when within reach, which, however, is very difficult to effect, is easily brought down. But if only a wing be broken, or the great body of the charge be not lodged very forcibly in him, he will run off at such a rate as would baffle most spaniels. The floriken has fine game plumage, with a short olive-coloured beak, a long neck and long legs; the cock has beautiful black hackles pendant around his neck, especially near the ears; which are leather-bound. The rims of the eyes are reddish, and the tips of the wings white. There are several kinds of the floriken; but their chief variation is in the form of the head and beak. The bastard floriken is much smaller, but has all the characteristic points, except the black hackles and white wings, of the larger kind. The latter are most commonly seen single, or at most in pairs; whereas the bastards are often found eight or ten together. Both kinds frequent the same sort of cover: they delight in grassy plains, keeping clear, like antelopes, of heavy covers, in which, however, when in danger, they are very ready to hide themselves. They are wonderfully shy; and will rather take to an open plain, where they can see and be seen a mile off, than venture where they may be taken by surprise. Their flesh is esteemed a delicacy: and their breasts are, like some kinds of quail, composed of white and brown intermixed. Such as feed on the jow are supposed to be bitter; but those found in the puttayrah, or upland bull-rushes, are generally the largest and best flavoured.

Hares are as numerous in India as in any other country. I have often started thirty or forty in a morning, and have been so successful more than once as to bring home eight or nine. I once shot eleven in the same day. It is common to put up three or four from the same patch of grass. However, there is not a wild rabbit to be seen throughout the country.

Towards the conclusion of the cold season, that is to say, about the beginning of March, the ortolans make their appearance, and assemble in such flights as can be compared to nothing better than to an immense swarm of bees. They are partial to stubbles, and new ploughed land; in the latter it is extremely difficult to distinguish them. They are most numerous in April and May, especially if the squalls of wind and rain called north-westers, be not frequent. Those violent gusts disperse them. In clear, hot weather, perhaps a score of large flights may be seen in various directions: they are not very difficult to approach; indeed whole flights will sometimes settle close to persons who happen to be on a favourite or inviting spot. Though many be killed by firing at random, while the cover is on the ground, it is best to take them on the wing. Major Ducarel once killed more than thirteen dozen by one discharge of dust-shot at a flight that passed close to him.

Wild pigeons abound every where, but more especially to the northward. They live chiefly in banks and old buildings. The green pigeon is chiefly to be found in the peepul and burghut trees: the berries of the former, which are somewhat like small unripe figs, are their favourite food, but communicate a very bitter taste to their flesh. These birds may frequently be seen to enter a tree, in large flights, but on approaching not one will be visible. I have often walked round and round a tree full in leaf, in which I had seen hundreds take shelter, without being able to distinguish one! Their colour is so similar to that of the foliage, that, added to their trick of hanging like a parrot by their legs, it requires much vigilance and steadiness to discover them. They are as large as the common tame pigeon; of which India may be considered the head quarters. The Mussulmans rear immense numbers; and the late Nabob Vizier Asoph ul Dowlah was so fond of them that he appropriated very large buildings and great sums of money for their maintenance. At a mud fort about ten miles from Lucknow, I saw one of his collections, amounting to at least twenty thousand pigeons, divided into flights according to their several colours: each covey was perfectly uniform. The most beautiful was a flight of white birds, birds, with bright purple heads and necks. They were very numerous; I doubt not but I am rather under the mark in estimating them at twelve hundred. The keepers, at my request, put the whole collection on the wing, when they absolutely darkened the air. The display was far beyond my expectation; but I should have enjoyed it more, had I not reflected that at that very moment thousands of the Nabob's subjects were dying daily for the want of that grain, which was lavished in support of so useless a vanity.

In shooting, or, indeed, whenever there is occasion to beat a cover, not only the kind of game sought will generally be found, but probably some of every species. It is common to start deer and hares while questing for peacocks or partridges; and on arriving at the banks of a tank or jeel, often one or more wild hogs will be found wallowing or rooting for cussaroos and singharras.

never beat, and was allowed by all ranks of sportsmen to be the fleetest horse that ever ran in England since the time of Childers. Eclipse was a very valuable stallion, and died at Cannons, Middlesex, on Saturday, February 28, 1789, aged 25.

* Melpomene, in 1769, won 50l. at Malton, 50l. at Penrith, 50l. at Stockton, a Stakes of 220gs. and 50l. at Richmond. She was then sold to Mr. Wentworth for 500gs. in hand, and Mr. Coates (her owner and breeder) was to receive 100gs. more, provided she won two Royal Plates in the following year. At Newmarket First Spring Meeting, 1771, she won the King's Plate for mares; she also won the King's Plates at Nottingham and York, and the Stewards' Cup at Northallerton.—She was the dam of Mr. Burdon's Czarina, the only one she ever bred, for she unfortunately broke her neck when Czarina was a foal.

C. 200gs.—and in 1777, he beat Telemachus, 8st. each, B. C. 200gs.

‡ Teucer, in 1773, won 50l. at Newcastle. In 1774, he won the King's Plates at Nottingham and York; and 50l. at Carlisle. He was afterwards purchased by Mr. Pratt for Lord Rockingham, who sent him into France to the Marquis de Conflans; and on the plains of Sablon, in 1776, at 9st. 1lb. he beat the Count d'Artois (late Lord Ossory's) Comus, 9st. four miles, 100gs.—He won several other races in France, and was afterwards a stallion.

FEAST

FEAST OF WIT.

A Person, rather hard of hearing, being told that a tradesman, whose affairs were rather deranged, had frequently been seen in liquor, exclaimed, "Aye, aye, poor man! I dare say he does every thing in his power to liquidate his debts."

Anecdote.—Peter the Great, contrary to the custom of other Princes, kept no huntsmen. He had verdurers to attend, not to the preservation of the game, but of his parks. So far from taking any delight in hunting, he could not bear the idea of what the poor animals must suffer. Being at a country house in the province of Moscow, a neighbouring gentleman, who was a great sportsman, thought to oblige his Majesty much by inviting him to a hunting party.—The Monarch thanked him with politeness, but declined the offer. "Hunt, gentlemen," said he—"hunt as much as you please: make war upon wild beasts. I cannot amuse myself that way, while I have enemies abroad to fight, and obstinate and untractable subjects at home to reform."

Since the Maroons, lately sent from Jamaica to Nova Scotia, were there, a gentleman, who had attended the service at one of their churches, asked one of their Captains, on coming out, if he knew what the clergyman had said?—when the former, being an old man, and not wishing to appear ignorant, replied, "Massa, parson say, no mus tief, no mus meddle with somebody wife, no mus quarrel, mus set down softly."—This (as in reality he did not understand a word) he conceived must be implied in so long a talk: but the whole tendency of the sermon was to convince the Maroons that they were happy, and to excite their gratitude to the people. It also contained panegyrics on the Commissary-General and the Governor, as their best friend! Hence, it seems, this poor ignorant Maroon judged of the sermon rather by what it ought to have been, than what it really was.

The follies of the age (says a correspondent) have kept pace with its vices. Captain Barclay's legs have turned the heads of half the sporting coxcombs in the kingdom. There is nothing, however puerile, profane, or contemptible, on which they are not eager to lose their money. One man is wagered to cry "Hot puddings, all hot," loud enough to be heard from Lambeth palace to Battersea bridge; a young divine is to read six chapters an hour in the Bible for six weeks; an old blackguard is to eat a thousand hog's puddings, a pound weight a piece, in a thousand hours, by which time it is presumed he will be so completely transformed into a swine, that the bristles will grow out of his back; a fourth champion engages to pull up a pound weight tied to a string, and laid at the distance of a mile from his standing. All these braggarts together are outdone by the poor Bramin in the East Indies, who sits for seven years, bare-bottomed, on a stool, stuck full full of nails, with the points upwards, as long as harrow teeth, and as boring as gimblets.

We know (adds the same correspondent) an elderly gentleman, named Bull, who has been going backward for twenty years past, not at the paltry rate of a thousand guineas for a thousand hours, but at fifty, sixty, seventy millions of pounds sterling a year! What is most wonderful is, that the old fellow keeps on his legs still, and unless he fall by his own folly, all the force in the world cannot throw him down.

PARODY on "the house that Jack built," in consequence of dividing the one-shilling gallery into compartments, or pigeon-holes, and the alledged unreasonable space taken up for private or annual boxes, at Covent-Garden Theatre:—

This is the House that Jack built.

These are the Boxes let to the Great, that visit the House that Jack built.

These are the Pigeon-holes made for the Poor, over the Boxes, let to the Great, that visit the House that Jack built.

This is the CAT engaged to squall, to the Poor in the pigeon-holes over the Boxes, let to the Great, that visit the House that Jack built.

This is John Bull with a bugle-horn, that hiss'd the Cat engaged to squall, to the Poor in the Pigeon-holes over the Boxes, let to the Great, who visit the House that Jack built.

This is the Thief-taker shaven and shorn, that took up John Bull with his bugle-horn, who hiss'd the Cat engaged to squall, to the Poor in the Pigeon-holes over the Boxes, let to the Great, who visit the House that Jack built.

This is the Manager full of scorn, who RAISED THE PRICE to the People forlorn, and directed the Thief-taker shaven and shorn, to take up John Bull with his bugle-horn, who hiss'd the Cat engaged to squall, to the Poor in the Pigeon-holes over the Boxes, let to the Great, who visit the House that Jack built.

THE Retort friendly, an historical fact.—When Miss Ann Pitt, sister to the great Wm. Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham, received a pension from Lord Bute, her brother wrote her a very angry note, saying "he never wished to live to see the name of Pitt and Pension together." When the same Wm. Pitt received a pension from the same Lord Bute of 3000l. per annum, his sister sent him back his own letter.

ANECDOTE.—Carolan, the Irish bard (born in 1670) had an insatiable fondness for whiskey, and refusing him this gratification, was a certain method of rousing his satire. Residing for some time in the house of a parsimonious lady, he happened one day, as he sat playing on his harp, to hear O'Flinn, the butler, unlocking the cellar door.—Instantly he arose, and, following the man, requested a glass of his favourite beverage; but the fellow thrust him rudely out of the cellar, declaring he would give him nothing, unless by orders from his mistress. The insulted and indignant bard instantly uttered the following bitter epigram:

"What a pity hell-gates are not kept by O'Flinn;
So surly a dog would let nobody in."

REPARTEE.—The notorious swindler Sandon, while suffering the punishment of pillory, on Saturday the

the 2d instant, at Warwick, observing an elderly countryman viewing him with much earnestness, called out—"Well, my old cock, you may as well take a spell for half an hour."—"Aye, so I will, (said the countryman) if you'll pay me in hard cash;—but I don't like your paper cheques!"—This witty reply was received, as may be imagined, with peals of laughter.

Two clergymen, named Adam and Low, applied for a living, which was promised to the one who could select the best text. The following Sunday Mr. Low ascended the pulpit, and prefaced his sermon with—"Adam, where art thou?" This was much approved; but the next Sunday Mr. Adam preached, and chose for his text, "Lo, here am I," which answer was so apposite, the living was presented to him.

A GENTLEMAN having been worsted in a dispute with another, endeavoured to revenge himself by speaking contemptuously of his late antagonist in whispers addressed to a third person; "he," said he, among other observations, "is far from a wise man." "True," replied the victorious disputant (who happened to overhear him) "I may be far from a wise man, but I am at present very near a fool."

AT the late Warwick races, Parmasan beat Stilton for the Maiden Plate of 50l. Had Cheshire Cheese started, it is supposed he must have beaten them both.

A beautiful Thought.—Some few years ago, several persons of distinction went to visit the school for the education of deaf and dumb children at Paris, under the direction of a celebrated Abbe, for the purpose of witnessing the progress they had made in learning. One of the boys being asked what was the meaning of the word gratitude, he immediately took a pen and wrote, "the memory of the heart!"

A PRISONER, within these few days, appeared at Stafford county gaol, bringing his own commitment. The constable, he said, was busy in his harvest, and could not come with him. It was not till after he had given his word and honour that he was the person named in the commitment, that he was admitted.

AN old lady has advertised in a provincial print, that she is leaving off the nursery business, and recommends her daughter to the gentlemen of the vicinity, as every way competent to give satisfaction.

WIMBLEDON Common seems to be the fashionable spot for political men of honour.—There Mr. Pitt and Mr. Tierney fought; and there Mr. Canning and his colleague have shewn their prowess; and there, if we remember right, Abershaw was hung in chains!—

"Blest spot!
Where heroes die, and felons rot!"

A GENTLEMAN, half stunned by the noise of the audience at Covent-garden Theatre, was told by one that he very much admired the rattles. "Then," replied the gentleman, "I wish with all my heart you had them in your throat."

A young girl from the country, who had been taken to Covent-Garden Theatre, being asked on her return, how she liked it? replied, that the people kept crying all night for old Price, but that the sulky old fellow never appeared.

 SPORT-

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

ON Monday, August 21, the meeting of the Woodmen of Arden commenced on Meriden Heath, when the gold medal was won by Lord Guernsey, and the silver medal by W. Palmer, Esq. On Wednesday, the silver arrow was shot for at nine score yards, and won by the Rev. Mr. Cattel. During the whole day, the band of the 14th Light Dragoons (which are quartered at Coventry) attended on the ground, which added much to the gaiety of the scene. On Friday, after a very severe contest, in which much skill was displayed, the bugle was won by Mr. Willoughby. The balls were numerously attended both evenings, and kept up with great spirit till a late hour; and we seldom have witnessed a greater display of beauty and fashion at this festive meeting. Miss Somerville and Miss Croxall were the fortunate ladies in the lottery. —On Thursday, a grand match of cricket was played on Meriden-Heath, Meriden against all England, which was won by Meriden.

COURSING.—The possessor of the largest and the finest stud of greyhounds, is said now to be Lord Rivers, who has nearly twenty-five brace of running dogs. Some weeks ago, Major Topham, the owner of Snowball, it is said was down with his Lordship, inspecting them, and declared that he had never seen finer dogs in his life, nor any more highly bred. Lord Rivers's celebrated dog Rolla was amongst the number. Nothing can exceed the high order in which they are kept. Colonel Lovelace is reported to have one of the fleetest greyhounds now in England, and allowed to be so in Norfolk, by Mr. Hamond and others. She was got by Mr. Mellish, son of old Snowball, and is said to be very beautiful, though very small, which makes her speed the more remarkable.—The Coursing Meetings are now grown so numerous in all the open parts of the southern counties, and the sport is getting so much in fashion, that an amateur of the diversion finds it difficult to get from one meeting to another in due time.

A CURIOUS circumstance occurred a few days since at Writtle-park, in the county of Essex, the residence of Miss Nightingale. A fox had the hardihood to enter the farm-yard in the day-time, and seizing a goose, threw it over his back, and was making off with his prey across an adjoining field, in which was a cow that had lately calved. The cries of the captive goose having reached her ears, she immediately set off in pursuit of the spoiler, who, retarded in his speed by the burden he bore, was soon overtaken, and compelled to relinquish his prize by the favourable and extraordinary interposition of the cow.

A SPORTING Character.—Extract of a Letter from Bath, dated Sep. 7, 1809.—" I have not heard much of the exploits of our sporting townsmen yet. Mr. Harry Hunt takes the lead; in fact, he is considered the best marksman in the county, and will match himself against

against any gentleman sportsman in the kingdom. I understand he has been sporting on his own manor, at Sans-Souci Cottage, Wilts, with great success. On Tuesday last, he killed twenty-four single birds, at the same number of successive shots, which is equal, probably, to any thing you will hear of in the sporting circles this season, and you may rely on it as an absolute fact."

A Court-Martial on Captain Sheene, of the Sussex Militia, was held at the Old Ship Inn, Brighton, on Thursday, the 21st instant, on a charge preferred against him by Sir George Thomas, for trespassing, by sporting on his grounds, contrary to an order issued by the General of the District. The Court came to a decision on Friday, when the charge not being substantiated, the Captain was honourably acquitted.

The Berkeley hounds were sold at Tattersall's, on Monday, the 25th instant: they were put up in five lots, and fetched about sixteen guineas a couple. Several of the hunters also fetched a good price.

Mr. Mellish's famous horse Sancho, died on Wednesday morning, the 20th instant.

Mr. Thomas Field, of Richmond, Yorkshire, is allowed to have two of the most promising colts in the North at this time in his possession, viz. a brown colt, two years old, by Remembrancer, dam by Antæus, Highflyer, out of Stamford's dam; and a bay yearling colt, by Remembrancer, dam by Pontac, out of Pencil's dam.

A shocking accident happened at the house of Mr. W. Coltman, Bracknell, Berks, on the evening of Saturday, the 2d instant. Mr. Coltman had been out partridge shooting with two other gentlemen, who were on a sporting visit, and on their return they deposited their guns, two of which were loaded, in a parlour next to the room where they were dining. A boy in the service of Mr. Coltman, and a son of the latter, were amusing themselves with the pieces, when that in Master Coltman's hand went off, killed the servant, and wounded a gentleman of the name of Ayres, who was at dinner, the charge having passed through the door of the room. Mr. Ayres lies in a very dangerous state.

On Wednesday, the 6th instant, as Sir John Hawkins, Bart. accompanied by a friend, was shooting on his manor, at Kelston, near Bath, the dogs having made a point, the latter, on alighting from his poney, by some means touched the trigger of his gun, and nearly the whole charge lodged in Sir John's side.—The shot were, however, afterwards extracted, and the Baronet is expected to recover.

We are sorry to state a melancholy circumstance, which took place the beginning of the present month:—John James Todd, Esq. (brother to Colonel Francis Todd, of the 1st Regiment of Guards) went out shooting in the neighbourhood of Horndean, Hampshire, when his gun accidentally went off whilst he was taking the ramrod out, and the contents of it being forced through his body, he lingered for twenty minutes, and then expired. The deceased gentleman was on a visit to his sister, Mrs. Halkett, the Lady of Captain H. of his Majesty's ship Ganges, who resides at Catherington-House.

One evening in the present month, month, as J. Paice, coachman to Lovelace Bigg Wither, Esq. of Manydown, near Basingstoke, was leading his master's carriage out of the Swan Inn Yard, at Kingsclere, the horses took fright, when he was thrown down and so severely bruised, that he languished only two days and then expired.

—— Morice, a labourer, who was lately employed to drive birds from the corn near Lincoln, whilst discharging a gun for that purpose, it burst, and shattered his arm so much, that he was obliged to undergo amputation. The misfortune being abruptly mentioned to his wife, occasioned her death the next day.

An unfortunate circumstance took place at Faldingworth, near Market Raisin, on a Sunday in this month (the feast-day in that parish). Thomas Cottingham and William Slack challenged each other to fight; the conflict continued for three quarters of an hour, when Cottingham fell from a blow of his antagonist, and died instantly. The fathers of the young men stood by, and each encouraged his son during the fight! —An inquest was held on the body of the deceased on Tuesday; and a verdict of Manslaughter being found against Slack, he was committed to the county gaol by Mr. Drury, of Lincoln, the coroner.

John Fosset, of South Botley, Wilts, a very dissolute character, was taken before some Magistrates for profaning the Sabbath day, and underwent a few hours imprisonment. In order to be revenged on the parish clergyman, he committed depredations on several head of cattle; and whilst destroying pheasants in the clergyman's pheasantry, the gun burst, by which his head and arm were so shattered, that he died shortly after.

Death of an English Sailor by an enormous Shark. — Calcutta, April 26, 1808.—On Friday last, as a gentleman was landing at Tankshall Ghaut, he observed several English seamen (belonging to one of the extra ships now lying in the river) bathing and swimming about, and immediately warned them of the danger they exposed themselves to, from the numerous sharks that generally frequented that place, and strongly recommended their coming on shore, to which, most unfortunately, they placed little or no attention, further than by one of them saying, "Jack, what does that there gemman with the white jacket say?" which he had scarcely pronounced, when dreadful to relate, one of his companions was seized by an enormous shark, which almost instantaneously dragged him under water, and he was never seen again, though every possible search was made—so powerful was the monster, that a man who swam to the assistance of the unfortunate sufferer, was, from endeavouring to save him, nearly dragged with him under water.

Mary Tyler, only thirteen years of age, was charged at the Thames Police Office, with stealing a horse and cart out of Spitalfields Market, the property of Elizabeth Thomas, dealer in fruit and green grocery, with which it was loaded, when she drove it to Scott's-fields, Hackney-road, where she unharnessed the horse, and led it to some street in Clerkenwell, and there sold it for a mere trifle. She has since been tried at the Old Bailey, and capitally convicted.

Poaching.—It was remarked by a late a late police magistrate, that seven in ten of the criminals who suffered at the gallows, had commenced their career of idleness and dishonesty with the practice of poaching. The Legislature, indeed, seems to have been aware that a great proportion of fatal criminality is traceable to this one source. Several of the Game Acts, in their preambles, expressly advert to "the great mischiefs which do ensue by inferior tradesmen, &c. and other dissolute persons, neglecting their trades and employments, who follow hunting, fishing, and other game, to the ruin of themselves and damage of their neighbours;" yet the game laws have been accused of unnecessary severity.

Pugilism. — A pitched battle, for 200 guineas, was fought, this month, in Braybrooke Park, Wilts, the seat of Major Cope, betwixt Flowers, the fighting coachman, of considerable provincial fame, and Isaac Jarvis, a professor, from the pits of Lansdowne. Flowers was backed by the Major, and the latter by P. Harris, Esq. and another amateur. At setting to, the betting was in favour of Jarvis, 6 to 4.—The contest was the most obstinate that had ever been witnessed in that part of the country, and resembled that between Gulley and Gregson at Newmarket, more than any we can refer our readers to in respect to blows, and the science and bottom were equal to young Belcher, and the gluttony of Crib. To describe the fight briefly is to state, that the combatants stood to each other manfully, and hit and stopped until one was off his legs—very unlike the modern town boxers, half a minute frequently elapsed before a blow could be put in, the stops were so dexterously managed; but after fighting three quarters of an hour, both the men lost their powers of hitting at intervals, and at this stage of the battle stopping was dispensed with. The blows struck in the former part of the battle were terrific, which the champions bore marks of.—Flowers lost the battle by a fall, after fighting an hour and ten minutes.

A very severe battle was fought in Five Fields, Chelsea, on the 15th instant, between a boatman, known on the river by the name of Smart Jemmy, and a stout coal-heaver, named Willis, for ten guineas aside. Willis was the favourite at starting, and continued so for upwards of half an hour; at the end of that time, however, he received a blow under the throat, called the Gregson tap, which laid him senseless on the ground; in this state he continued for some moments, and on his recovery he declined any farther contest. Those who witness the battle, won with so much difficulty, describe the combatants as entitled to the praise of first-rate gluttons.

An affray took place last month at Didmarton, Gloucestershire, between George Chappell, of that place, and John Matthews, of Sopworth. After fighting some time, Chappell, a very old man, finding his strength fail him, declined the contest, when his brutal antagonist, a hale hearty fellow, of about 40, rushed on him, and striking a violent blow under his ear, killed him on the spot. The Coroner's Jury sat on the body, and brought in a verdict of Wilful Murder against Matthews, who is committed to Gloucester Gaol for trial.

A desperate battle took place, in Oxford-street, on Monday, the 25th

25th instant, between two coachmen, who drive the Uxbridge coaches; one of them, a stout man, belonging to the opposition coach, picked a quarrel with the other, a very short slender man, who, after receiving abusive language, and several blows, set-to, and gave the big coachman a most complete drubbing. The battle lasted twenty minutes.

During the above fight, a gentleman dropped his pocket-book, containing a 5l. and a 2l. Bank of England notes, which were picked up by a man belonging to a fishmonger in Jermyn-street. On being requested to give it up, he refused, and was followed to his master's house, who compelled his man to give up his prize.

Wonders.—M. Degen, a watchmaker, of Vienna, has invented a machine, by which a person may rise into the air, flying in various directions, with the celerity of a bird.—Baron Lutgendorf has invented a machine, by means of which, a person may exist under water, without fear of being drowned. It is expected to be extremely useful!

The Aeronaut Garnerin, lately ascended from Tivoli, a pleasure garden, at Paris, at ten at night, and decended between seven and eight the following morning at Vaels, a small league from Aix-la-Chapelle, in the circle of Westphalia.

A match of cricket was played at Shipdham, this month, between the gentlemen of Downham and those of Shipdham. State of the game as follows:—Downham first innings 45, second ditto 84. Shipdham first innings 57, second ditto 25; majority in favour of Downham 48 runs. Three brothers in the Downham club, named Johnson, in the above match, got 84 runs.

A curious examination took place at the Marlborough-street Police-office, on the 15th instant, instituted by a Mr. Jones against three other persons. About a fortnight previous, a foot race for 100 guineas was run betwixt Jones and Pollard, twenty miles on Epsom Downs, which was won by the latter. It appeared by the testimony of the prosecutor, that Jones, from Lancashire, challenged to run any man in England by public advertisement, and that Mr. Walker, one of the defendants, engaged to find a man within a given time, and Pollard was sent for from Manchester, and won the match easily. It appeared that Jones, the runner, who was one of the defendants, had represented to Mr. Jones, his backer, that he could beat any man, and on his ipse dixit the prosecutor had staked 50l. in the hands of the third defendant, Mr. Nelson. It was urged by the prosecutor, that, by artifice, he had been prevailed on to back his namesake by the parties on the opposite side; but it turned out that the race was fairly conducted, and that, so far from collusion, Pollard could give his adversary the odds. Mr. Adolphus attended for the prosecutor, and Mr. Alley for the defendants. The latter condemned, in strong terms, the conduct of the prosecutor, who, by his own imbecility, had lost his money, and attempted to intimidate the defendants to return it. He recommended a prosecution against the prosecutor, at the suit of the three defendants, for false imprisonment. The Magistrate coincided with Mr. Alley, and dismissed the defendants.

It

It is stated in an Edinburgh newspaper, that the young Scotch Clergyman, who undertook to read six chapters of the bible every hour for 1000 successive hours, after proceeding in his arduous task thirteen days and nights, fell into a profound sleep, or trance, from which he has never yet awoke, although it is evident he still lives!

A young man, named Dawson, waiter at the White Lion Inn, Sleaford, Lincolnshire, on Tuesday, the 12th instant, trundled a hoop from that place to Lincoln, a distance of seventeen miles, over hilly and otherwise unfavourable ground, without once letting it fall or touch his body, in three hours and a half. Considerable bets were depending on the performance.

A pedestrian feat of rather a singular nature, was undertaken by a young man of Folkstone, on Monday, the 11th instant, who engaged, for a trifling wager, to walk backwards from the Market Place in that town, to the Bell public-house, at the entrance into Hythe, a distance of about four miles, in one hour and a half, which he accomplished with apparent ease in sixteen minutes within the time allowed. A considerable concourse of people were attracted by the novelty of the circumstance, and several bets were made.

Foot-race.—A hard twenty-miles match was run on the 12th instant, on a piece of chosen ground of a mile, near Maidenhead, betwixt Mr. Grigg, a quick runner, and Matthew Mark, for fifty guineas aside. The countryman was rather the favourite, and he took the lead at the rate of eight miles an hour, followed closely by his adversary, and they were together at ten miles, having performed it in one hour and eight minutes. Both made play here, and being nearly alike in speed, the race was perhaps the best ever witnessed. They were together at nineteen miles, without being able to gain ten yards of each other, and Mr. Grigg won the match by two minutes only. The distance was performed in two hours and twenty minutes.

Bullock v. Brothel.—During the present month, at North Shields, a bullock broke loose from some butchers, and ran through the street in a furious manner, but his progress was at length stopped by his taking down the Hole-in-the-Wall quay, which was scarcely wide enough to allow him a free passage. To the astonishment of the spectators, when he came to the door of the Hole-in-the-Wall, which was opened by a sudden twist of his body, he entered the house, and walked majestically up stairs into the kitchen, where the scene of uproar and confusion that ensued is indescribable; the bullock was heard bellowing, the women screaming, and the furniture breaking in pieces; in the midst of which confusion, the floor yielded to the ponderous weight of the animal, who, however, disengaged himself by a desperate plunge, and, breaking down a partition, entered the grand chamber of the Lady Abbess, where he also laid some valuable furniture under his feet, and then thrust his head through the window, whence he loudly bellowed defiance to his pursuers. He was at last secured, and is, perhaps, the first male visitor that ever got out of that stew without having his pockets lightened.

POETRY.

THE HIGH COURT OF DIANA.

OCCASIONAL ADDRESS,

Spoken by Mr. Kemble, at the opening of Covent-Garden Theatre, on Monday, Sept. 18, 1809.

IN early Greece, and in a barb'rous age,
A wretched tumbrel was the actor's stage:
The Muse, with cheek reclin'd in pensive shame,
Blush'd for her wanderers from the path to Fame.
ÆSCHYLUS sprang, and storm'd, as he rose,
His country's passions, like his country's foes.
Rough from the battle, train'd to vanquish men,
E'en as his sword he wielded, so his pen.
He smote the heart, the trembling sense oppress'd,
And gave no quarter to the human breast.
Yet, stage improvement mark'd the soldier's sway,
And ting'd with taste the captives to his lay.
Then, first (the cart of Thespis overthrown)
Form'd by rude planks, a theatre was known:
Cop'd by the Heavens, it o'erspread the lawn,
And light on scenic dress appear'd to dawn.
But, all divine, when SOPHOCLES appear'd,
'Twas then the Drama's Majesty was rear'd.
Builders and decorators came—their boast
Was who could grace the lofty poet most:
The lofty poet lack'd not brains to know
That Dramatists require the Drama's show.
Nature's perfection springs from various parts;
And "Nature's Mirror" needs the Sister Arts.
Hence grew the splendour of the scene—and hence
The handmaids that embellish eloquence:
Dance, Music, Painting, Pageantry, Parade—
All that give zest, or yield illusion aid.
Rome caught the sparks from Greece; improv'd the plan;
At last the flame through modern Europe ran.

Our scene now decks, in an illumin'd age,
The Bards who first gave vigour to our stage:—
Thus SHAKSPEARE's fire burns brighter than of yore;
And may the stage that boasts him burn no more!
For this our fabric—banish we, to-night,
Figures worn threadbare, metaphors grown trite,
No Phœnix from her ashes shall arise—
Stale to our thoughts as sparrows to our eyes:
No naked truism be cloak'd anew,
To tell that fire, which cheers, consumes us too;
No—let a Briton now to Britons speak;
His cause is strong, although his language weak.
We feel, with glory, all to Britain due,
And British artists rais'd this pile for you;
While, zealous as our patrons, here we stand,
To guard the staple genius of our land.
Solid our building, heavy our expence,
We rest our claim on your munificence:
What ardour plans a nation's taste to raise,
A nation's liberality repays.

THE FOWLER.

From Montgomery's Poems.

A Careless, whistling lad, am I,
On sky-lark wings my moments fly;
There's not a fowler more renown'd,
In all the world, for ten miles round.
Ah! who like me can spread the net,
Or tune the merry flageolet?
Then why, O! why should I repine,
Since all the roving birds are mine.

The thrush and linnet in the vale,
The sweet, sequester'd nightingale,
The bulfinch, wren, and woodlark, all
Obey my summons when I call.
O! could I form some cunning snare,
To catch the coy, coquetting fair
In Cupid's filmy web so fine,
The pretty girls should all be mine.

When all were mine, among the rest
I'd choose the lass I lik'd the best;
And should my charming mate be kind,
And smile and kiss me to my mind,
With her I'd tie the nuptial knot,
Make Hymen's cage of my poor cot,
And love away this fleeting life
Like Robin Redbreast and his wife.

SONG,

From the new Drama of 'The Russian Imposter.'

LAWYER Gruftykotz, of our town,
Married a beauty of high renown,
A gentle, loving soul;
And soon he got on her blind side—
She was blinder than a mole.

The Lawyer had a maid, call'd Grace,
He ogled Grace before her face—
For a month, away he hies;
A trav'lling Doctor, passing through,
Came Madam Gruftykotz to view,
And he couch'd my Lady's eyes.

When Lawyer Gruftykotz came back,
He gave his maid a gentle smack:
"You brute!" my Lady cries:
"Mr. Gruftykotz, no longer think
Upon your naughty ways I'll wink;
You'll find I've got my eyes."

Ye married men, take warning straight,
From Lawyer Gruftykotz's fate,
If married joys you prize;
And do not have so little grace,
To kiss the maids before her face,
Lest your wife should find her eyes!

TOM GOBBLE.

TOM Gobble was a grocer's son,
Heigho! says Gobble:
He gave a ven'son dinner for fun,
And he had a belly as big as a tun,
With his handy dandy, bacon and gravy,
Ah! ha! says Alderman Gobble.

The servant usher'd the company in,
Heigho! says Gobble:
"The dinner is ready," quoth Tom, with a grin,
So he tuck'd a napkin under his chin,
With his handy dandy, bacon and gravy,
Ah! ha! says Alderman Gobble.

Then Betty, the cookmaid, she gave a squall,
Heigho! says Gobble:
Poor John, the footman, has had a fall,
And down stairs tumbled, ven'son and all,
With his handy dandy, bacon and gravy,
Alas! says Alderman Gobble.

So down the Alderman ran in a fright;
Heigho! says Gobble:
And there sat John, in a terrible plight,
Astride on the ven'son, bolt upright,
With his handy dandy, bacon and gravy!
Dear me! says Alderman Gobble.

Was ever man so cruelly put on!
Heigho! says Gobble:
Get off the meat, you rascally glutton,
You've made my ven'son a saddle of mutton,
With your handy dandy, bacon and gravy,
Good lack! says Alderman Gobble.

Lord, Sir, says Betty, what a splash;
Heigho! says Gobble:
'Tis a monstrous bad rumbusticle crash,
But to-morrow I'll tickle it up in a hash,
With my handy dandy, bacon and gravy,
Aye, do! says Alderman Gobble!

TO THE MEMORY OF P. WENTWORTH, ESQ.

MATURE grown in age, through life's race ever just,
Thy loss we must ever deplore;

But though dead, Virtue's claim will cover thy dust,
And preserve it when time is no more.

In the vault now secure from the jostles of life,
(For rude jostles no doubt have been found ;)
May the contested heats of vexation and strife,
Be all buried in this sacred ground.

Chaste and pure were thy thoughts, thy soul ever bright,
Shone a pattern to all human kind ;
And of colours thou most didst esteem a milk white,*
As the sign of a free spotless mind.

Long as time shall remain, we thy name shall revere,
As it holds in our mem'ry a place ;
Whilst each friend, with a heart to thy merits sincere,
Shall drop tears big from Gratitude's face.

York, Sept. 12, 1809. C. A.

CÆSAR THE FIERCE AND FLORA THE FALSE.

A Parody.

A BULL-DOG so fierce, and a Spaniel so meek,
Convers'd as they lay on the mow ;
They star'd and they bark'd, and then utter'd a squeak,
For the name of the dog we will Cæsar bespeak,
And the bitch was the fair little Flo.

And " Oh, then," said Cæsar, " a bull-baiting, dear,
To-morrow takes place at the fair ;
I thither am sent, while I very much fear,
Some dogs, to your eyes that more pleasing appear,
Your affections from me will ensnare."

" Nay, check these suspicions," said Flora, distress'd,
" Nor injure your true love so far ;
For no other dog, you assured may rest,
But Cæsar alone with my heart shall be blest,
For Cæsar alone ruleth there.

" If e'er on my charms noisy Pincher or Jack
Repose, while they call me their wife,
I wish (here she sent forth a false oath, alack !)
That your ghost may appear, without tail to its back,
Ascend from below with a terrible crack,
And frighten me out of my life."

To J—g—n hasten'd this Bull-Dog so fierce,
Little Flora gave vent to her woe ;
Scarce three days elaps'd, (how I grieve to rehearse !)
When a Greyhound, bespangled with spots, (what a curse!)
Arriv'd at the kennel of Flo.

His collar, his person, his flattering vows,
Soon made her untrue to her swain ;
He won her attachment by graces and bows ;
At length she consented to call him her spouse,
And ne'er thought of Cæsar again.

And now they were join'd in Hymen's soft ties,
And now they for feasting prepar'd ;
With pails full of tripe they regaled their eyes ;
But how great was their wonder, dismay, and surprize,
When they heard the bell ring in the yard !

Then first, much astonish'd, did Flora behold
Some other dog plac'd at her side,
Who bark'd not at all, though he look'd very bold,
While round to the fair-one his eye-balls he roll'd,
And open'd his mouth very wide !

His visage was gruff, and gigantic his paw,
His collar was sable to view ;
From the guests he made quickly all pleasure withdraw :
The dogs all shriek'd out at the sight of his claw,
And the cats all in concert cried—" mew !"

* Alluding to the colour Mr. Wentworth's horses were always rode in, viz. white satin waistcoat and cap.

So

So great was the fear and dismay that he spread,
So much had he frighten'd each dog,
None spoke, till poor Flora took courage and said,—
"I pray that your gruffness aside might
be laid,
While you deign to partake of our prog."

This said, her request with attention he grants,
And he promis'd to alter his mien;
He began like a donkey to kick and to prance,
His flesh from his bones fell, as if t'were
romance,
And a skeleton dog there was seen.

Through the party this sent forth amazement, no doubt;
This struck with a panic the row!
The maggots crept in, and the maggots
crept out,
They straggled, they jump'd, and they scamper'd about,
While the spectre address'd little Flo!

These words to false Flora the skeleton spake,
While boldly he claim'd her as wife:—
"Behold I am come, without tail to my back,
To bear you to torture, to pains, and to rack,
To sink you below with a terrible crack,
And so put an end to your life."

He spoke,—and his claws round the fair
one he threw;—
Poor Flora redoubled her moan;
Then off with his prize to the Devil he flew,
(Sad fate for poor Flora) but nobody knew
Which way to Old Nick they had gone.

Not long liv'd the Greyhound, and none
since that hour
T'inhabit the kennel presume;
There Chronicles tell, forc'd by some mighty pow'r,
She suffers, repentant, as well as her
wooer,
And mourns her deplorable doom!

At midnight, twelve times in each year
does her sprite,
When mortals are all snoring out,
Appear in the yard, on a moon-shining night,
(Ye Gods! what a dreadful and horrible sight!)
And howls as he twirls her about.

With tubs full of brimstone, and water,
and mud,
'Midst dog-goblins they utter their woe:
A toast they put round that would freeze one's heart's blood:—
"Let us all drink a health to Cæsar the proud,
And his consort, the false little Flo."

THE DRAMATIC RACE,

A Catch.—By a Lover of the Turf.

CLEAR, clear the course!—make room,
make room, I say!
Now they are off, and Jonson makes the play.
I'll bet the odds!—Done, Sir, with you and you!
Shakespeare keeps near him,—and he'll win it too!

Here's even money!—Done for a hundred!—Done!
Now, Jonson,—now or never!—He has won!
I'll take my oath that Shakespeare won
the prize!
Dam'me! whoever says he lost it, lies.

THE DOCTOR AND HIS PATIENT.

A LORD, afflicted in his eyes,
To Radcliffe for advice applies;
Radcliffe himself of sight not sound,
(Was fond to see the glass go round,)
With no small gravity replies,
"Quit wine, Sir, if you love your eyes."
"Quit wine, my Friend! why sure you
jest,
For you, whose eyes are not the best,
Still truly push the bottle round,
As if no danger thence were found."
"'Tis not in point, Sir," Radcliffe cries;
"Wine I love better than my eyes!"

Sir G. Webster's ch. g. Hotspur, 8st. 10lb. agst Mr. Webster's b. g. Aid-de-Camp, 9st. 10lb.—No race.

The sport expected on Saturday was unpleasantly abridged in consequence of a very severe accident that happened to that celebrated rider Frank Buckle, who rode Swingbar (and not Dragsman, as erroneously stated in several newspapers) which he won in high style; but before he could pull up his horse, a carriage improperly crossed that part of the ground which of course he was compelled to take, nor, with all his skill, was it possible for him to avoid the pole of it, which deeply lacerated his right thigh. This passed, he unfortunately met in contact with a person on horseback, when both horses and riders were brought to the ground, and it was at first feared that both riders were killed. Buckle was much hurt, but the other received but little injury. Fortunately no bones were fractured, but Buckle was so ill after the accident, that he was removed from the course in a carriage. Neither of the horses were materially hurt.

Buckle was to have rode Bacchanal against Election, for the Ladies' Plate, but being incapacitated, Election walked over the course for the Plate, no Jockey being there but those above weight.
